

Sarah Munro is a health services researcher whose focus is knowledge translation science and practice in women's health. She is currently a PhD Candidate in Interdisciplinary Studies at the University of British Columbia (supervisors: Dr. Patti Janssen, Dr. Jude Kornelsen), and she holds a BA (Honours) and Master's in English Language and Literature. For the past ten years, Sarah has engaged with knowledge partners in collaborative health services research that is action-oriented and focused on impactful solutions. Her proposed postdoctoral fellowship in implementation and knowledge translation research will be conducted between UBC and Dartmouth College and will explore the implementation of best practices in family planning.

She also conducts research investigating the development and implementation of decision support tools to help patients and their care teams to make informed, shared healthcare decisions.
